END OF THE DIALOGUE?

POLITICAL POLARIZATION, THE SUPREME COURT, AND CONGRESS

Richard L. Hasen
rhasen@law.uci.edu

University of California, Irvine ~ School of Law

The paper can be downloaded free of charge from SSRN at:
END OF THE DIALOGUE?
POLITICAL POLARIZATION, THE SUPREME COURT, AND CONGRESS

RICHARD L. HASEN*

INTRODUCTION

On the last of three historic days of oral argument considering the constitutionality of the Obama Administration’s health care law, the Justices of the United States Supreme Court turned to the question of severability: if the Court struck down one or more major components of the law, should the entire, 900+-page law\(^1\) fall as well, or should the Court sever off the unconstitutional parts and preserve the rest of it? One of the lawyers arguing in favor of severability contended that even if the Court struck down the heart of the law, “yes, Congress would have wanted\(^2\) other provisions kept intact, such as those giving new benefits for victims of black lung disease. In response, Justice Kennedy asked: “Is that the real Congress or a hypothetical Congress?\(^3\) The audience laughed.\(^4\)

Justice Kennedy’s response was funny, but the issue was serious. The Justices were well aware that the health care law barely passed on a party-line vote, thanks to some arm-twisting by the Democratic Obama administration, unusual procedural maneuverings between the House and Senate, and side deals to bring along wary moderate Democrats.\(^5\) At oral argument Justice Scalia

---

* Chancellor’s Professor of Law and Political Science, UC Irvine School of Law. Thanks to Sam Bagenstos, Jeb Barnes, Larry Baum, Erwin Chemerinsky, Bill Eskridge, Hal Krent, Sarah Lawsky, Marty Lederman, Sandy Levinson, and Michael Waterstone for useful comments and suggestions, James Buatti for excellent and tireless research assistance, and Ellen Augustiniak, Dianna Sahhar, and Christina Tsou for wonderful library assistance.

3 Id.

4 Id. (noting audience laughter).

referred to the so-called “Cornhusker kickback,” a sweetheart deal for Nebraska which was at one point inserted in the law (and later removed) to insure Nebraska Senator Ben Nelson’s vote.6 Partisan acrimony over the health care law only intensified when Republicans took back control of the House and Democrats lost their brief, 60-vote filibuster-proof majority in the Senate. Republicans vowed to overturn what they called “Obamacare,” and they took over 30 votes in the House to do just that, with their efforts predictably never picked up by the majority Democratic Senate.7 The partisan divide was national, with 26 states—all led by Republicans—filing a brief in the Supreme Court opposing the constitutionality of the health care law.8

By the time of the oral argument, the Justices knew that the Court’s decision on which provisions of the health care law remained valid likely would be the final word thanks to the United States Senate’s rules which require 60 votes to make changes to most laws, and the fact that partisan polarization and a closely-divided Senate meant that neither party had 60 votes to alter the status quo. In response to the lawyer’s plea for severability at oral argument, Justice Scalia responded: “You can’t repeal the rest of the Act because you’re not going to get 60 votes in the Senate to repeal the rest. It’s not a matter of enacting a new Act. You’ve got to get 60 votes to repeal it. So [if the Court severs the unconstitutional parts out] the rest of the Act is going to be the law.”9

The Court’s recognition of the political reality at oral argument was not matched in the 193 pages of opinions in the case. The Justices’ analysis of the health care law gave no inkling of the intense partisan atmosphere surrounding the law or the legal challenge. When the Justices stated their varying opinions on 9 2012 WL 1031484, *72. Some have suggested that Republicans could try to use the “reconciliation” process to repeal the health care law should Republicans retake control of the Senate. Reconciliation bills are not subject to a Senate filibuster. For the difficulties Republicans would face in overturning the health care law even using reconciliation, see Ryan Lizza, Why Romney Won’t Repeal Obamacare, THE NEW YORKER News Desk Blog, June 28, 2012, http://www.newyorker.com/online/blogs/newsdesk/2012/06/why-romney-wont-repeal-obamacare.html.

---

severability, none mentioned the fact that the Court’s word was likely to be final because of partisan deadlock, even as four dissenters said that the rest of the law was not severable and it all needed to fall. That is not to say that the issue of congressional polarization was out of the Justices’ thoughts as they wrote their opinions. Instead, legal doctrine had not expressly recognized the defining feature of modern American politics: deep political polarization along party lines.

Nor did the Justices expressly acknowledge that their own decision in the health care case would play into partisan politics and the upcoming presidential election. Partisan realignment hit Congress a long time ago, as Southern Democrats abandoned the Democratic Party and liberal Republicans lost their elections, moved to the right, or retired, to the point that the most liberal Republican in Congress today is more conservative than the most conservative Democrat. But the partisan realignment of the Supreme Court is much more recent. It occurred only in 2011, when liberal/moderate Republican Justice John Paul Stevens retired, replaced by liberal Democrat Elena Kagan. The Court now had five conservative Justices who are all Republican, and four liberal Justices who are all Democrats.11

A 5-4 party split in the health care case threatened the legitimacy of the Supreme Court, which had already begun to see an unprecedented decline in popularity among the public.12 Chief Justice Roberts’ surprise decision to vote with the four liberal Democrats to uphold the health care law startled Republicans and was viewed as a major victory for President Obama’s reelection chances.13 Roberts’ popularity among Republicans unsurprisingly declined sharply after the health care decision,14 but likely would rise again if he voted, as expected, to strike down affirmative action in education and parts of the Voting Rights Act, and to uphold new abortion restrictions. The effect of future partisan-divided Supreme Court decisions on public opinion remains uncertain.

This Article considers the likely effects of continued political polarization on the relative power of Congress and the Supreme Court.15 Polarization already 10 132 S.Ct. at 2607-08 (majority opn.); id. at 2668-77 (joint dissenting opn).

---

11 See infra Part III.A.
12 See infra Part III.B.
15 The Presidency’s strength against Congress also has been growing as a result of political polarization, which has provided an opening for unilateral presidential action on both domestic and foreign affairs. See Jide Nzelibe, Partisan Conflicts Over Presidential Authority, 53 WM. & MARY L. REV. 389 (2012); Matthew N. Beckman & Anthony J. McGann, Navigating the Legislative Divide: Polarization, Presidents, and Policymaking in the United States, 20 J. THEORETICAL POL. 201 (2008); Neal Devins, Presidential Unilateralism and Political is leading to an increase the power of the Court against Congress, whether or not the Justices affirmatively seek that additional power. The governing model of Congressional-Supreme Court relations is that the branches are in dialogue on statutory interpretation: Congress writes federal statutes, the Court interprets them, and Congress has the power to overrule the Court’s interpretations. The Court’s interpretive rules are premised upon this dialogic model, such as the rule that Supreme Court statutory interpretation precedents are subject to “super strong” stare decisis protection because Congress can always correct an errant court interpretation. Legislation scholars also write as though congressional overriding remains common.\(^{16}\)

In fact, in the last two decades the rate of Congressional overriding of Supreme Court statutory decisions has plummeted dramatically, from an average of 12 overrulings of Supreme Court cases in each two-year Congressional term during the 1975-1990 period to an average of 4.8 overrides for each term from 1991-2000 and to a mere 2.7 average number of overrides for each term from 2001-2012. Although some of the decline seems attributable to the lower volume of Supreme Court statutory interpretation decisions, the decline in overrides greatly outpaces this decline in cases. Instead, partisanship seems to have strongly diminished the opportunities for bipartisan overridings of Supreme Court cases, in which Democrats and Republicans come together to reverse the Supreme Court.\(^{17}\)

In its place we see a new, but rarer, phenomenon, partisan overriding, which appears to require conditions of near-unified control of both branches of Congress and the presidency. The two recent examples are the Military Commissions Act of 2006,\(^{18}\) in which Republicans overturned the Court’s

---

This step followed the inability of Congress to pass legislation accomplishing similar ends. The Supreme Court’s decisions on executive power also affect Congress-Presidential relations. These important developments are beyond the scope of this Article.

\(^{17}\) See infra Part I.B.

statutory interpretation decision in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld\(^{19}\) on the habeas corpus rights of enemy combatants, and the Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act of 2009,\(^{20}\) in which Democrats overturned the Court’s statutory interpretation decision in Ledbetter v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Company\(^{21}\) on how to measure the statute of limitations period in certain employment discrimination lawsuits. In a highly polarized atmosphere and with Senate rules usually requiring 60 votes to change the status quo, the Court’s word on the meaning of statutes is now final almost as often as its word on constitutional interpretation.

Although political polarization has benefitted the Supreme Court’s power relative to Congress in the short term, the longer term power relations are more uncertain. Aside from the statutory interpretation dialogue, Congress interacts with the Supreme Court in other ways, including through Senate confirmation of Supreme Court judicial nominees. The recent partisan realignment of the Supreme Court makes it more likely that a Supreme Court judicial nominee will be filibustered in the Senate, thanks to the increasing willingness of Senators to oppose nominees on ideological grounds and increased partisan polarization in the Senate. The number of Senators from the opposing party of the nominating president voting against Supreme Court nominees is approaching or exceeding the filibuster level. Depending upon how the politics plays out in a possible filibuster of a Supreme Court judicial nominee, we may see either an erosion of the use of the filibuster in the Senate or a compromise which would weaken the power of the judiciary, such as term limits imposed upon future Supreme Court Justices.\(^{22}\)

Part I of this Article demonstrates that despite the model of Congress-Court dialogue, and Supreme Court statutory interpretation tools premised on dialogue, congressional overridings of Supreme Court statutory interpretation precedents have become exceedingly rare. The effect of this change is to empower the Court over Congress. Part II argues that the steep decline in overridings over the last two decades appears due in large part to increased polarization in Congress and not simply to a decline in the number of Supreme Court statutory interpretation cases. When Congress does override a Supreme Court case, it is now more likely to be a partisan overriding, pushed through in periods of unified government. Part III is more speculative. It considers how polarization in Congress and the partisan realignment of the Supreme Court—a Court in which all the conservative Justices are Republicans and all the liberal Justices are Democrats—may eventually lead to a major confrontation in Congress over the power of the Senate filibuster. That confrontation may leave the Senate, the Supreme Court, or both, looking very different than they are today.
Furthermore, partisan realignment has the potential to harm the Supreme Court’s legitimacy in a way which we have not witnessed in modern times.

I.
THE DECLINE IN CONGRESSIONAL OVERRIDES OF SUPREME COURT STATUTORY DECISIONS

A. The Dialogic Model in Theory

The United States Constitution gives Congress the power to pass federal legislation (upon the president’s agreement or an overriding of a veto) and the judiciary the power to review cases arising under these “Laws of the United States.” The Supreme Court (or a lower court) sometimes strikes down a federal statute as unconstitutional. In response, members of Congress occasionally introduce constitutional amendments to overturn these rulings, and congressional committees hold hearings on proposed constitutional amendments. For example, Congress has considered overturning the Supreme Court’s ruling that flag-burning constitutes speech protected by the First Amendment and overturning the Court’s recent ruling in Citizens United v. Federal Election Commission affording business corporations the right to spend their general treasury funds on candidate election campaigns. But the very difficult supermajority requirements for a constitutional amendment—two-thirds of Congress and three-quarters of state legislatures must agree—usually leaves the Court’s constitutional decisions standing.

In contrast to judicial pronouncements about the constitutionality of federal statutes, which can be overridden solely through the arduous constitutional amendment process, Congress has the power to override a judicial interpretation of a federal statute simply by passing a new or amended statute under the normal rules for passing legislation.

---

The Supreme Court has premised its rules for interpreting federal statutes on this dialogic model in which Congress may correct the Supreme Court’s errors of statutory interpretation. Most importantly, the Court applies what Eskridge has called a “super-strong presumption” of stare decisis for statutory rulings. The leading application, Flood v. Kuhn, involved the Supreme Court’s failure to overturn earlier precedents which had concluded that professional baseball was exempt from federal antitrust laws. In the years after the Court had initially held that baseball was entitled to an exception, the Court then inconsistently held that professional boxing and professional football were not entitled to such an exemption. In Flood, the Court reaffirmed its earlier inconsistent precedent giving baseball the exemption even though “[i]t appears that every member of the Court thought that [the earlier precedent] was wrongly decided.” Justice Blackmun, for the Court, wrote that “[i]f there is any inconsistency or illogic in all this, it is an inconsistency and illogic of long standing to be remedied by the Congress and not by this Court.”

Other Court statutory interpretation doctrines also presume the ability of Congress to correct an errant statutory precedent. The Court has justified literal-if-illogical applications of congressional statutes on grounds that Congress can fix any drafting problems in response to the Court’s decision. As the Court wrote in Griffin v. Oceanic Contractors, Inc., a case allowing for an exceedingly large penalty under federal maritime law, that “[t]he remedy for any dissatisfaction with the results in particular cases lies with Congress and not with this Court. Congress may amend the statute; we may not.”

Three statutory construction rules related to legislative inaction, sometimes applied by the Court, also presume Congress’s ability to override ‘override’ includes a statute that (1) completely overrules the holding of a statutory interpretation decision, just as a subsequent Court would overrule an unsatisfactory precedent; (2) modifies the result of a decision in some material way, such that the same case would have been decided differently; or (3) modifies the consequences of the decision, such that the same case would have been decided in the same way but subsequent cases would be decided differently…. ‘[O]verride’ [does not] include statutes for which the legislative history—mainly committee reports and hearings—[do] not indicate a legislative focus on judicial decisions.”

33 Flood, 407 U.S. at 284.
mistaken court interpretations of federal statutes. Under the \textit{acquiescence rule}, “[i]f Congress is aware of an authoritative agency or judicial interpretation of a statute and does not amend the statute, the Court has sometimes presumed that Congress has ‘acquiesced’ in the interpretation’s correctness.”\textsuperscript{36} Under the \textit{reenactment rule}, “[i]f Congress reenacts a statute without making any material changes in its wording, the Court will often presume that Congress intends to incorporate authoritative agency and judicial interpretations of that language into the reenacted statute.”\textsuperscript{37} For example, in \textit{Farragher v. City of Boca Raton},\textsuperscript{38} the Court noted that in the Civil Rights Act of 1991 Congress overrode a number of the Court’s statutory interpretation decisions regarding Title VII hostile work environment claims but Congress did not override the Court’s earlier decision in \textit{Meritor Savings Bank FSB v. Vinson}.\textsuperscript{39} The Court therefore concluded that its earlier interpretation in \textit{Meritor} was sound.\textsuperscript{40} Under the \textit{rejected proposal rule}, “[i]f Congress (in conference committee) or one chamber (on the floor) considers and rejects specific statutory language, the Court has often been reluctant to interpret the statute along lines of the rejected language.”\textsuperscript{41}

Finally, in explaining application of the severability test for federal legislation, the dissenting Justices in the recent health care case premised their arguments for striking down the whole statute (and not severing the unconstitutional parts) on the ability of Congress to restore any parts of the law

\textsuperscript{36} Eskridge, Frickey, & Garrett, supra note 32, at 1048.
\textsuperscript{37} Id. quoting Lorillard v. Pons ("Congress is presumed to be aware of an administrative or judicial interpretation of a statute and to adopt that interpretation when it reenacts a statute without change"). Justice Scalia and Bryan Garner give qualified support to this rule in their recent book. Antonioin Scalia & Bryan A. Garner, Reading Law: The Interpretation of Legal Texts 322-26 (2012). However, they do not base it in legislative agreement, but instead on the fact that "members of the bar practicing in that field reasonably enough assume that, in statutes pertaining to that field, the term bears this same meaning.....This footing is sounder than the fanciful presumption of legislative knowledge." Id. at 324.
\textsuperscript{38} 524 U.S. 775 (1998).
\textsuperscript{39} 477 U.S. 57 (1986).
\textsuperscript{40} "We are bound to honor Meritor on this point not merely because of the high value placed on stare decisis in statutory interpretation, but for a further reason as well. With the amendments enacted by the Civil Rights Act of 1991, Congress both expanded the monetary relief available under Title VII to include compensatory and punitive damages, , and modified the statutory grounds of several of our decisions. The decision of Congress to leave Meritor intact is conspicuous. We thus have to assume that in expanding employers' potential liability under Title VII, Congress relied on our statements in Meritor about the limits of employer liability. To disregard those statements now (even if we were convinced of reasons for doing so) would be not only to disregard stare decisis in statutory interpretation, but to substitute our revised judgment about the proper allocation of the costs of harassment for Congress's considered decision on the subject." Farragher, 524 U.S. at 804.n4. Eskridge, Frickey, & Garrett, supra note 32, at 1049.
\textsuperscript{41} Id. at 1049.
worthy of restoration: “The Judiciary, if it orders uncritical severance, then assumes the legislative function; for it imposes on the Nation, by the Court’s decree, its own new statutory regime, consisting of policies, risks, and duties that Congress did not enact. That can be a more extreme exercise of the judicial power than striking the whole statute and allowing Congress to address the conditions that pertained when the statute was considered at the outset.”

B. The Dialogic Model in Practice Over Time

1. 1967-1990

Many scholars have examined the circumstances under which Congress responds to a Supreme Court decision through a legislative override and how the Court reacts to such overrides. In the idealized pluralistic model of politics and dialogue, “[i]f litigation reveals statutory flaws, or produces objectionable judicial interpretations, interest groups can appeal to Congress, which can scrutinize the courts’ decisions and revise the original statute in light of lessons learned from the litigation.”

William Eskridge’s leading 1991 study, using an empirical analysis of overrides, game theory, and positive political theory, presented a more nuanced picture of how the Court interprets federal statutes. He argued that “the Court’s 42 NFIB v. Sebelius, 132 S.Ct. at 2669 (joint dissenting opinion). The dissenters would have struck down the entire health care law, including non-germane provisions such as one requiring chain restaurants to display nutritional content: “The Court has not previously had occasion to consider severability in the context of an omnibus enactment like the ACA, which includes not only many provisions that are ancillary to its central provisions but also many that are entirely unrelated—hitched on because it was a quick way to get them passed despite opposition, or because their proponents could exact their enactment as the quid pro quo for their needed support. When we are confronted with such a so-called ‘Christmas tree,’ a law to which many nongermane ornaments have been attached, we think the proper rule must be that when the tree no longer exists the ornaments are superfluous. We have no reliable basis for knowing which pieces of the Act would have passed on their own. It is certain that many of them would not have, and it is not a proper function of this Court to guess which. To sever the statute in that manner would be to make a new law, not to enforce an old one. This is not part of our duty.” Id. at 2675-76 (internal quotation marks omitted).

---

44 Id. at 6.
statutory interpretation decisions are more responsive to the expectations of the current Congress than to those of the enacting Congress. But the Court is also responsive to its own institutional and personal preferences—especially its preference for coherence and predictability in the law.”

Consistent with Eskridge, there is a broad, technical literature in public choice and positive political theory which generally posits that Justices seek to interpret federal statutes as close as possible to their own preferences without being overridden by Congress. The chances of congressional override depend not only upon the preferences of the median member of Congress but also upon the preferences of committee chairs and party leaders, who act as the gatekeepers for legislation.

Jeb Barnes’ detailed study of 100 randomly-selected overrides in the 1974-1990 period found that “Congress—or more precisely, members of prestige and re-election committees—tend to draft more comprehensive and effective overrides, especially when the override involves the collection of tax revenue.” Further, “if the override issue split the courts along partisan lines in the pre-override period, federal judges seemed more likely to resist congressional oversight, especially when the issue involved the interpretation of the statutory rights of discrete, insular minorities, such as African Americans or immigrants.”

Nancy Staudt, Rene Lindstadt, and Jason O’Connor canvassed all express congressional responses—and not just overrides—to Supreme Court tax decisions from 1954 to 2005. The authors found that “the Court-Congress dynamic is not unidimensional but rather nuanced and varied. The existing literature implies when Congress responds to the Court, it does so in a hostile manner. To be sure, judicial decisions often spark a negative response in Congress, but nearly as often the cases lead to supportive and positive responses, like codification legislation.”

45 Eskridge, supra note 28, at 334.
47 Barnes, supra note 43, at 18.
48 Id.
Most recently, Deborah Widiss has written a pair of articles examining congressional overrides in the employment law context. In the first article, she demonstrated that the Supreme Court often narrowly construes or ignores Congressional override attempts. In the second article, she showed that the Court often ignores congressional overrides when construing similar language in a parallel statute, in apparent violation of the rule to interpret identical language in related statutes to mean the same thing in each statute.

Eskridge’s 1991 article on overrides was an important corrective to the belief that congressional overrides were rare. Whether or not the total number of overrides has in the past counted as “rare” in any absolute sense, in the 1970s and 1980s, Congress used its override power with increasing frequency. As Eskridge described, “The four Congresses from 1967-74 generated an average of six Supreme Court overrides per [two year] Congress[ional period], not many more than the numbers uncovered in prior studies. In contrast, the eight Congresses from 1975-90, beginning with the 94th, generated an average of twelve Supreme Court overrides per Congress.” Like Eskridge’s study, Barnes’s study ended with an examination of congressional overrides occurring in 1990. Barnes found that “[d]espite obstacles, absolute levels of congressional override activity have increased.” Although Eskridge’s empirical study ended with 1990, his article also described the Civil Rights Act of 1991, which overrode at least 9 Supreme Court cases.

---

50 Widiss, supra note 34.
52 Justice Scalia and Bryan Garner endorse the canon, but reject its basis as following the legislature’s intent: “Though it is often presented as effectuating the legislative ‘intent,’ the related-statute canon is not, to tell the truth, based upon a realistic assessment of what the legislature actually meant. That would assume an implausible legislative knowledge of related legislation in the past, and an impossible legislative knowledge of related legislation yet to be enacted.” SCALIA & GARNER, supra note 37, at 252. They justify the canon as based on “a realistic assessment of what the legislature ought to have meant.” Id.
53 Eskridge, supra note 28, at 335. But see Bertrall Ross, Against Constitutional Mainstreaming, 78 U. CHI. L. REV. 1203, 1228 (2011) (“overrides are exceedingly rare, making it risky to rely on them as a means of ensuring consistency between the Court's statutory interpretations and legislative preferences. In fact, one scholar has famously argued [in 1960] that statutory overrides are so rare that the Court's interpretation of statutes is ‘hardly less “final” than the Court's decisions interpreting the Constitution.’”).
54 Eskridge, supra note 28, at 338.
55 BARNES, supra note 43, at 15.
56 Id. at 43 (italics omitted); see also id. at 44 (“Congress is increasingly relying on overrides as a check on the courts”).
57 Eskridge, supra note 28, at 333 n.4. I say “at least” 9 because Eskridge counts more than 9 as overrides. But using Eskridge’s own methodology I come up with only 9 overruled cases, with
In 2005, Barnes predicted that congressional overrides would become more common over time: “Congress may need to revise statutes because today’s statutes may be increasingly prone to obsolescence and inconsistency; today’s Supreme Court is increasingly overwhelmed and less likely to harmonize conflicting lower court statutory interpretations; and today’s federal judges have greater opportunities to overreach—from the right or left—under the guise of statutory interpretation.”

2. 1991-2012

Perhaps because of the strength of the evidence of a rise in override activity reported in the earlier studies, scholars have failed to notice that Congressional overruling of Supreme Court cases slowed down dramatically since 1991 and essentially halted in January 2009. Thus, writing in 2012, Jim Brudney stated that “[a]s scholars in law and political science have observed, Congress has become more inclined to override Court decisions since the early 1970s.” Similarly, the 2005 study of congressional responses to Supreme Court tax decisions over a 51-year period by Staudt, Lindstat, and O’Connor failed to note that of the 12 overrides of tax decisions by Congress in the 1954-2005 period, only two occurred later than 1986 (and the last in 2001).

I examined evidence of Congressional overrides of Supreme Court statutory interpretation decisions from the end of Eskridge’s study (ending in 1990) to the present, trying my best to replicate Eskridge’s methodology so as to allow for an apples-to-apples comparison of congressional override activity. This proved to be methodologically difficult, in part because Congress is now less likely to note the overruling of a Supreme Court opinion in a committee report. The Methodological Appendix (Appendix 4) at the end of this Article describes in detail how I sought to identify overrides from 1991-2012; in addition, I erred on the side of inclusion in doubtful cases.

The results are dramatic: according to Eskridge’s data the number of overrides rose from an average of 6 Supreme Court overrides per Congress from 1967-74 to a rise in 12 overrides per Congress from 1975-1990. According to my updated data, overrides then fell to 4.8 per Congress from 1991-2000 and fell even further to 2.7 overrides per Congress from 2001-2012. See Figure 1.

The 4.8 average overrides per Congress in the 1991-2000 period may overstates the amount of override activity, as it is heavily influenced by the Civil Rights Act of 1991, a single law which overturned nine Supreme Court cases.

Overrides have slowed to a trickle in the last four years. Congress passed two technical overrides in 2011, one involving trademark issues and the other a court venue provision. The last significant congressional overrides occurred in early 2009. The Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act of 2009, the first bill signed by President Obama, overturned a Supreme Court employment decision. In addition, the Family Smoking and Tobacco Act of 2009 responded to a 2000 Supreme Court decision, giving the FDA some authority to regulate tobacco. See Figure 2, showing a dramatic drop in the number of congressional overrides.

---

62 I list all the overridden cases I discovered in Appendix 1. The figures for 2012 are current through August 2012 and will be updated prior to publication.
63 See Appendix I.
65 See Appendix IV.
3. A Closer Look at Post-2000 Congressional Overrides

In the last twelve years, since January 2001, Congress has passed only 13 pieces of legislation overriding Supreme Court decisions, overriding a total of 16 Supreme Court statutory interpretation decisions. The overrides fall into three categories: technical overrides, bipartisan overrides, and partisan overrides.

Technical overrides. Seven of the bills since 2001 were technical overrides contained in larger bills. These overrides likely did not garner the attention of many members of Congress, with some overrides folded in much larger bills and not subject to debate.66 These seven bills included eight overrides making generally minor changes to Supreme Court statutory precedent.67

---

66 I classify an override as “technical” if the New York Times contained no article the same year as the bill’s passage noting that Congress was considering overriding, or in fact overrode, one or more Supreme Court cases. See also Hausegger & Baum, supra note 43, at 228 (noting that many overrides are contained in larger bill where “[i]n all likelihood their inclusion in a bill had little effect on its passage; rather the override was successful because the bill had congressional support for other reasons…In several instances it is doubtful that most members of Congress were even aware of the override provisions.”).

Bipartisan overrides. Two of the six non-technical override bills passed with broad bipartisan majorities. One bill amended the Americans with Disabilities Act to strengthen its protections. Another renewed expiring provisions of the Voting Rights Act for another 25 years and changed the standards for proving discrimination under the Act. Each bill reversed two major Supreme Court statutory precedents, and each bill passed in large part thanks to the strong leadership and support the then-chair of the House Judiciary Committee, James Sensenbrenner (R-WI). It is unclear whether either bill would have passed without Sensenbrenner’s interest, passion, and power.68

The ADA Amendments clearly overturned Supreme Court (and lower court) precedent in a number of important ways, although it left some key statutory questions unresolved.69

68 See Chai R. Feldblum, Kevin Barry, Emily A. Benfer, The ADA Amendments Act of 2008, 13 TEX. J. ON C.L. & C.R. 187, 195-96 (2008) (“The first serious breakthrough for the ADA Restoration Act happened in the summer of 2006. Congressman Jim Sensenbrenner (R-WI), then Chair of the House Judiciary Committee, conveyed his interest in sponsoring a bill that would restore the broad coverage of disability under the ADA. Congressman Sensenbrenner's wife, Cheryl Sensenbrenner, had been on the board of the AAPD since 2003 and was an enthusiastic supporter of the ADA Restoration Act. …Having a senior Republican Member of Congress and Chair of the House Judiciary Committee express his interest in sponsoring an ADA Restoration Act significantly changed the political dynamics around the possible success of such a bill.”); Nathaniel Persily, The Promise and Pitfalls of the New Voting Rights Act, 117 YALE L.J. 174, 180-81 (2007) (“One cannot overstate the importance of the unlikely leadership of James Sensenbrenner, Chairman of the House Committee on the Judiciary, in pushing through the legislation. He wanted the reauthorization of the Voting Rights Act to occur on his watch, and, consistent with his leadership style on other issues, nothing was going to stand in his way. Pursuant to the rules of the Republican Conference, however, his term as Chairman was to expire at the end of 2006, a year before section 5 of the VRA was scheduled to sunset. Therefore, the timetable for the legislation was moved up a year, with House hearings held between October 2005 and May 2006.”).

As for the Voting Rights Act amendments, the story is more complicated. Nate Persily explained that Congress’s overriding of one of the two Supreme Court voting rights decisions, Georgia v. Ashcroft, was done in a deliberately murky way to avoid a deep partisan divide about the workings of the Act.70

The procedure by which the VRA Amendments passed was highly unusual, as Rick Pildes explained:

[T]he enacted law was “virtually unchanged” from the version first introduced in the House…. [I]t is widely known that the bill was drafted by the civil rights community, then pushed through the House process by Chairman Sensenbrenner, for whom, as Persily does note, “nothing was going to stand in [the] way.” The House hearings were not designed to provide a full airing of the issues, but for advocates to build what Persily calls “a lawyer’s brief,” one that would enable the renewed VRA to withstand later constitutional challenge. In the House, virtually none of the academics with years of expertise in the study of the VRA were called to testify. Second, Persily exposes just how dramatically the enacted VRA papered over and obscured the profound policy conflicts that actually exist on these issues in Congress. While the Senate passed the law by a 98-0 vote, the Senate Judiciary Committee could not agree on a committee report explaining what the bill actually did, and did not even issue the report until after the Senate had approved the bill and just before the President signed it into law—and even then, with the support of committee members from only one political party.71

A third bipartisan override was the 2009 Family Smoking Prevention and Tobacco Control Act, which gave the Food and Drug Administration the power to regulate tobacco as a drug72 Congress used the law to respond to a 2000 Supreme Court decision holding that Congress had not given the FDA such power.73 The 70 “[T]here are good reasons why Congress left this important provision [reversing Georgia v. Ashcroft] undefined. The fractious Senate Report makes clear that Democrats and Republicans hold dramatically differing views as to what this standard requires. The other available legislative history elides the likely political effects of various valid interpretations. The potential interpretations of the law run the gamut from entrenching either Republican or Democratic gerrymanders. The central conceptual disputes revolve around the types of districts and candidates protected by the standard, the data necessary to evaluate the ability to elect, and the degree of flexibility jurisdictions should be accorded to adapt to political changes throughout the twenty-five year tenure of this law.” Persily, supra note 68, at 218.

72 See Appendix IV.

largest tobacco company in the U.S., Philip Morris, supported the bill, and the final vote was broadly bipartisan—although 29 Republicans (and one Democrat) first voted to filibuster the bill.

Partisan overrides. Three overrides during the 2000-2012 period divided the Congress strongly on party lines. (This contrast sharply with the prior period, when partisan overrides were rare.) In the Military Commissions Act of 2006, Congress partially reversed the Supreme Court’s decision in Hamdan v. Rumsfield by further limiting the habeas corpus rights of alien enemy combatants at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba and elsewhere. Republicans favored the bill in the House by a vote of 218-7 and in the Senate by a vote of 53-1. Democrats opposed the bill in the House by a vote of 32-162 and in the Senate by a vote of 12-32.

In the Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act of 2009, Congress reversed the Supreme Court’s decision in Ledbetter v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Company by extending the statute of limitations in certain employment discrimination suits. President Obama campaigned on the Republicans’ earlier blockage of this bill as an issue of equal rights for women, he pushed heavily for its passage as a candidate, and the Act was the first bill he signed as President. Democrats favored the bill in the House by a vote of 247-4 and in the Senate by a vote of 55-0. Republicans opposed the bill in the House by a vote of 3-173 and in the Senate by a vote of 4-36. Notably, the four Republican Senators who voted in favor of the bill were the Senate’s four Republican women Senators (Collins, Huchison, Murkowski, and Snowe).

Finally—and perhaps a bit more debatably—I classify the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 as a partisan override even though the final larger Pentagon bill containing the override passed on a bipartisan basis. The part of the 76 See infra Figure 12 and accompanying text; Solimine & Walker, supra note 29, at 452 (noting that only 7 of 18 overrides identified by Eskridge during the 1981-88 period provoked partisan controversy).

---

bill containing an override reversed the Supreme Court’s decision in Rasul v. Bush\(^\text{82}\) giving Guantanamo detainees the right to challenge their detentions in civilian court. On an amendment to add this provision to a larger bill, 42 of 47 Democrats voting cast a vote against the Amendment.\(^\text{83}\) Democrats ultimately voted for the final bill for a number of reasons, including the fact that it contained another amendment barring torture of enemy combatants, that it was within an even broader defense bill. Further, Democratic Senator and chief conference negotiator Senator Carl Levin responded to criticism from human rights groups for agreeing to a bill containing the detainee court provision, explaining “that he had settled for the less damaging of two bad outcomes, [and] saying he had deflected more onerous provisions that House Republicans wanted, including a demand that interrogators who abused prisoners be granted immunity from prosecution.”\(^\text{84}\)

C.  The Consequences of Few Congressional Overrides

Whether or not one subscribes to the view of positive political theorists that Supreme Court Justices interpret federal statutes in line with their personal preferences and their strategic calculations about the chances of reversal, there seems little doubt that as things currently stand that a majority of Supreme Court Justices is usually getting its way when it comes to statutory interpretation. Supreme Court interpretations of federal statutes are now very likely to be final. The combination of Supreme Court interpretive rules premised on the Court-Congress dialogue, and the failure of Congress to override any significant number of Court interpretations of federal statutes, has given the Justices the last word on statutory interpretation questions almost as often as they get the last word on constitutional questions.

Consider in this regard the Court’s dispute over severability in the hyperpartisan and uniquely prominent Supreme Court health care case. A majority of the Court held that the requirement that states opt into a new Medicare program or risk losing all of their medical funding was unconstitutional as exceeding the Supreme Court’s spending power.\(^\text{85}\) The dissenters agreed on this point, but also would have struck down as exceeding Congress’s taxing and Commerce Clause powers the “individual mandate” portion of the law, requiring individuals to purchase health insurance pay a penalty to the government.\(^{86}\) (The majority upheld this provision as a permissible exercise of Congress’s taxing power.\(^{87}\))

\(^{82}\) 542 U.S. 466 (2004).

\(^{85}\) NFIB, 132 S.Ct. at 2604-08.

Both the majority and dissent had to confront the question of severability, because each took the position that a portion of the law was unconstitutional. With part of the law unconstitutional, should the remaining parts survive? Both opinions referred to congressional intent in their severability analyses.

The majority held that the unconstitutional Medicare provision was severable from the rest of the Act: “We have no way of knowing how many States will accept the terms of the [Medicaid] expansion, but we do not believe Congress would have wanted the whole Act to fall, simply because some may choose not to participate. The other reforms Congress enacted, after all, will remain fully operative as a law, and will still function in a way consistent with Congress’ basic objectives in enacting the statute. Confident that Congress would not have intended anything different, we conclude that the rest of the Act need not fall in light of our constitutional holding.”\(^{88}\)

The dissenters reached the opposite conclusion, holding that even the unrelated provisions of the health care law needed to fall with the unconstitutional provisions. Striking the entire statute, the dissenters claimed, was a lesser exercise of judicial power than keeping the rest intact, because striking the entire act would “allow[] Congress” to decide after the decision which provisions to reenact.\(^{89}\)

Justice Scalia (one of the dissenting Justices) had it half right when he remarked on the third day of the health care oral argument that the danger of severance was that there would not be enough votes in the Senate to overcome a filibuster of a bill repealing the rest of the Act: “You can’t repeal the rest of the Act because you’re not going to get 60 votes in the Senate to repeal the rest.”\(^{90}\)

This was only half right because if the Court would have stricken the entire statute (as Justice Scalia voted to do with the other dissenters), there also would not have been enough votes in the Senate to overcome a filibuster of a bill reinstating the rest of the Act.

Indeed, during the same oral argument at which Justice Scalia made the “60 votes” comment, he could only see the danger of the Court mistakenly allowing the rest of the law to stand but not the parallel danger of mistakenly striking down the entire law. Justice Scalia called upon the lawyer Paul Clement to recognize the danger of “legislative inertia” when Clement conceded in response to a question by Justice Sotomayor that “if you strike down only the \(^{86}\) Id. at 2633 (joint dissenting opinion).

\(^{87}\) Id. at 2494-95.

\(^{88}\) Id. at 2608 (internal quotation marks and citations omitted).

\(^{89}\) Id. at 2668 (joint dissenting opinion).

\(^{90}\) 2012 WL 1031484, *72.
individual mandate, Congress could say the next day, well, that's the last thing we ever wanted to do; so, we’re going to strike down the rest of the statute immediately and then try to fix the problem. So whatever you do Congress is going to have options.”

Consider this exchange:

JUSTICE SOTOMAYOR: I guess, on the bottom line, is why don't we let Congress fix it?

MR. CLEMENT: Well, let me answer the bottom line question, which is, no matter what you do in this case, at some point there's going to be — if you strike down the mandate, there’s going to be something for Congress to do. The question is really what task do you want to give Congress? Do you want to give Congress the task of fixing the statute after something has been taken out, especially a provision at the heart, or do you want to give Congress the task of fixing health care? And I think it would be better in this situation —

JUSTICE SOTOMAYOR: We're not taking —if we strike down one provision, we're not taking that power away from Congress. Congress could look at it without the mandatory coverage provision and say this model doesn't work; let’s start from the beginning. Or it could choose to fix what it has. We’re not declaring — one portion doesn’t force Congress into any path.

MR. CLEMENT: And, of course, that's right, Justice Sotomayor, and no matter what you do here, Congress will have the options available. So, if you — if you strike down only the individual mandate, Congress could say the next day, well, that's the last thing we ever wanted to do; so, we’re going to strike down the rest of the statute immediately and then try to fix the problem. So, whatever you do, Congress is going to have options. The question is --

JUSTICE SCALIA: Well, there's such a thing as legislative inertia, isn't there?

MR. CLEMENT: Well, that's exactly —

JUSTICE SCALIA: I mean —

MR. CLEMENT: — what I was going to say, Justice Scalia, which is I think the question for this Court is — we all recognize there’s legislative inertia. And then the question is what's the best result in light of that reality?

JUSTICE SOTOMAYOR: Are you suggesting that we should take on more power to the Court?

MR. CLEMENT: No, I —

JUSTICE SOTOMAYOR: Because Congress would choose to take one path rather than another. That’s sort of taking onto the Court more power than one, I think, would want.

More realistically, Clement should have said, “So whatever you do is likely to be the last word.” The Court’s severability decision was almost certain to be final because neither party in the partisan Congress would be able to repeal or reinstate the relevant parts of the health care law through the normal legislative process. The end of override dialogue increases the Court’s power at Congress’s expense.

D. Overrides in Broader Perspective

Although the decline in the number of overrides has strengthened the Supreme Court compared to Congress, a full assessment of the relative power of the Court and Congress depends more than on the number of congressional overrides. Consider three additional factors:

First, and significantly, Congress retains some power over the Court through the Senate’s power to confirm Supreme Court Justices, an issue considered below in Part III. (Of course, Congress also has the power to impeach Justices.)

Second, even in the rare circumstance in which Congress overrides a Supreme Court statutory interpretation decision, Widiss’s evidence shows that the Court sometimes ignores or sidesteps it. Widiss notes that Congress was careful in its override of the Ledbetter decision to amend not just the statute directly at issue in the case (Title VII), but parallel provisions under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act, the Americans with Disabilities Act, and the Rehabilitation Act. More generally, the Court has great control over its docket and the scope of its rulings.

Third, when it comes to constitutional adjudication, the Court also has expanded its power against Congress to strike down federal statutes as unconstitutional. For example, the Court in the last few decades has required Congress, like litigants in court, to come forward with specific evidence of unconstitutional action by states in order to be permitted to exercise some of its powers against the states. In one of the most recent important examples of the Court imposing a tough evidentiary standard on Congress, the Court warned Congress that it was likely to overturn a key provision of the Voting Rights Act if Congress did not go back and rewrite the law, taking into account recent evidence of state racial discrimination in voting which might justify the new law. Yet the same forces which seem to inhibit congressional overrides of Court statutory interpretation decisions also may be responsible for Congress’s failure to respond to the Court’s invitation to update the Voting Rights Act, and the issue of the Act’s constitutionality likely will be back before the Court soon.

---

92 Widiss, supra note 51, at 923 n.371. Widiss notes an interesting lower court application of the acquiescence rule: “[Congress’s override] was insufficient to end reliance on Ledbetter as a shadow precedent. In a recent case arising under the FMLA, the district court held Ledbetter controlling because Congress had not amended the FMLA when it amended these other statutes. Maher v. Int’l Paper Co., 600 F. Supp. 2d 940, 950 n.5 (W.D. Mich. 2009).” Id.

In the health care case, it is unclear whether the Court’s Spending Clause holding or the opinion of the four dissenters combined with Chief Justice Roberts’ opinion on the scope of Congress’s Commerce Clause power will rein in congressional power when similar issues arise. Whether it does or not is in the hands of Supreme Court Justices, not Congress.

II. EXPLAINING THE DECLINE IN CONGRESSIONAL OVERRIDES

What explains the steep decline in overrides by Congress of Supreme Court statutory decisions? I argue below that the increase in political polarization in Congress is a likely (at least partial) culprit. Before turning to polarization, I consider other potential sources for the decline, finding that a decline in Supreme Court statutory interpretation decisions also may be part of the answer.

A. A Decline in (Major) Federal Legislation

At first blush, it might appear that the decline in overrides simply tracks a decline in the number of federal statutes passed by Congress. If Congress generally is passing fewer laws, then it is possible that laws which override Supreme Court statutory interpretation cases have declined at a proportional rate. The data show that the number of public laws passed by Congress indeed has declined markedly in the past two decades. But the pattern of passage in federal legislation does not match up with the pattern of Congressional override activity.

As illustrated in Figure 3, according to data from the “Resume of Congressional Activity” produced by Congress, the number of public laws passed by Congress has declined over time.

---

Despite the decline, the pattern on legislation rates generally does not track the pattern on Congressional override activity illustrated in Figure 1. From 1967-74, the first period of Eskridge’s override study, Congress passed an average of 648 public laws per two-year Congress. From 1975-90, during the period of a doubling of the amount of override activity compared to the 1967-74 period, the average number of public laws actually fell to 559. From 1991 through 2010, the average number of public laws fell to 410 per Congress, a drop of 27 percent compared to the 1975-1990 period. During the same period, the number of overrides per session dropped 68 percent compared to the 1975-1990 period (and nearly 78 percent comparing the 1975-1990 period with the 2001-2012 period). Looking at the overall trends, the number of overrides does not appear closely correlated to the total number of public laws which Congress passes.

Nor does the override pattern seem related to the amount of “major legislation” passed in Congress, at least according to one measure of “major legislation.” Using data compiled by David Mayhew of major federal legislation

---

96 The measure I use for “major legislation,” David Mayhew’s count based primarily upon year-end press coverage, is controversial. See SARAH A. BINDER: STALEMATE: THE CAUSES AND CONSEQUENCES OF LEGISLATIVE GRIDLOCK 79 (2003) (noting that Mayhew and his critics disagree on whether the consequence of major legislation differs in times of divided or united government). On the relationship of Mayhew’s laws and political polarization, see Nolan McCarty, The Policy Effects of Political Polarization, in THE TRANSFORMATION OF AMERICAN POLITICS: ACTIVIST GOVERNMENT AND THE RISE OF CONSERVATISM 223, 237-40 (Paul Pierson & Theda Skocpol, eds. 2007); see also NOLAN MCCARTY, KEITH T. POOLE, & HOWARD ROSENTHAL, in the post-World War II period,97 I examined Congress’s record of passing such legislation from 1967 to 2010. The average number of major laws passed per Congress in the 1967-74 period was 19. Congress averaged just 10.1 major laws from the 1975-90 period (the period in which overrides doubled) and that number rose to 12 major laws per Congress from 1991-2010 when overrides fell dramatically. There appears no relationship between the number of overrides and the amount of major legislation passed by Congress.

B. A Decline in (Or Change in Direction of) Supreme Court Statutory Interpretation Decisions

Although override activity does not track the general trend of litigation in Congress, trends of Supreme Court statutory interpretation activity look 97 Mayhew originally compiled data through 1991 for his book, Divided We Govern: Party Control, Legislation, and Investigations, and posted that data, along with updates on major legislation (for the second edition of his book) through 2008 on his website. http://pantheon.yale.edu/~dmayhew/data3.html. He supplied the 2009-2010 list of major legislation to me via email, as it is not yet posted on his site.

somewhat more promising. Over time, the Supreme Court has decided fewer federal statutory interpretation cases, just as it has decided fewer cases overall.98

I analyzed the trends with Supreme Court statutory interpretation caselaw using the Supreme Court database maintained at Washington University St. Louis.99

As Figure 5 illustrates, from 1967-74, the first period of Eskridge’s override study, the Supreme Court averaged about 43 statutory interpretation cases per year.100 From 1975-90, the Court averaged 48 statutory interpretation cases per year. The doubling in overrides from the first to the second periods in Eskridge’s study cannot be explained by the slight rise in the number of statutory interpretation cases in the second period.

98 Chief Justice Roberts recently opined that the overall number of Supreme Court cases may be dropping because of a supposed drop in the amount of “major legislation” passed by Congress. Jennifer Lee, Chief Justice Notes Lack of Major Legislation Passed By Congress, Associated Press, May 4, 2007, http://legacy.utsandiego.com/news/politics/20070504-0318-wst-chiefjustice-alaska.html (“‘No one actually knows why the number of cases we are taking is declining,’ said Roberts, who was the keynote speaker at the association's banquet. ‘I think there really are three significant reasons. The first is the lack of any major legislation coming out of Congress in the last couple of decades.’”). Mayhew’s data are inconsistent with this hypothesis.

100 I computed these figures using the U.S. Supreme Court database, searching all Supreme Court opinions from 1967-2010 coded as involving “Federal Statutes.”
From 1991-2010, the Court averaged 27.7 cases per year, a 43 percent drop compared to the 1975-2010 period. The drop in the number of Supreme Court statutory interpretation cases therefore may explain part of the drop in the number of Congressional overrulings: there are simply fewer Supreme Court cases for Congress to overrule (though of course Congress can also choose to overrule cases from earlier periods). It is not clear how much of the decline in override activity may be attributable to a decline in the number of Supreme Court statutory interpretation decisions, given how the earlier patterns in overrides and Supreme Court decisions do not match up.

A related possibility is that Congress now overrides fewer cases because members of Congress are now more likely to agree with the outcome of Supreme Court statutory interpretation cases: there is no need to override a correct decision.\(^{101}\)

This hypothesis seems unlikely when judged against the evidence. As Figure 6 demonstrates, since the mid-1970s, Supreme Court statutory interpretation decisions coded as “liberal” have generally ranged between 40 and 60% of total statutory decisions.\(^{102}\) There is no general pattern of ideological direction which could explain a decline in overridings: liberals and conservatives in Congress each are likely to disagree with around half of the Court’s statutory interpretation decisions. Thus, there is no overall change in ideological direction on the Court in the relevant period which would explain the pattern of sharply declining overrides.

\(^{101}\) Alternatively, it is possible that Congressional deference to Supreme Court statutory interpretation has increased in the last twenty years. I am unaware of any evidence that Members of Congress’s attitude toward the Supreme Court has recently shifted in this direction.

\(^{102}\) The U.S. Supreme Court database coded the direction of these cases as “liberal” or “conservative.”
C. Political Polarization

With these other potential explanations at most providing only a part of the story, I turn to the possibility that overrides are declining in part because of political polarization. The data here draw from Poole and Rosenthal’s well-accepted data posted at Voteview.com. Poole, Rosenthal, and additional collaborators have coded roll call votes and other data to produce ideological measures for each member of the House and Senate.

Using these data, there is no question that today’s Congress is the most polarized by party since the late 19th century. Congress likely to get even more polarized going forward, especially as the few remaining moderate Senators leave the Senate, with many likely replaced by Tea Party Republicans (for example, Ted Cruz is likely to replace Texas’s Kay Bailey Huchison and Richard Mourdock could replace Indiana’s Dick Lugar).

---

103 These data and next five charts are used with the permission of Professor Poole.
In a story told in great detail elsewhere, polarization in Congress began with the ideological realignment in the South following the Civil Rights Era, as conservative Southern Democrats moved to the Republican Party. Figure 7 shows the distance between the parties over time using the well-respected database of roll call votes compiled Poole, Rosenthal and their newer collaborators, showing the ideological distance between the parties.

Figure 7

Figures 8 and 9 show the steep decline in the percentage of moderates in the House and Senate.

Figure 8

Figure 9

Figures 10 and 11 show the sharp drop in the number of “overlapping” Senators and House members—Republicans who are more liberal than the most conservative Democrat and Democrats who are more conservative than the most liberal Republican. These political animals are now extinct.
These charts tell a story consistent with Eskridge’s evidence of the changes over time in the number of congressional overrides. Before the 1990s, there were a number of liberal Republicans and conservative Democrats in the House, and many more moderates in both parties. This created ample space for bipartisan overrides of Supreme Court statutory decisions. The number of moderates started plummeting in the 1980s and the trend has continued ever since. The decline of these moderates has made it harder to put together a winning voting coalition to overturn Supreme Court statutory decisions.

It is not only that moderates, liberal Republicans, and conservative Democrats, have left Congress; it is that those who remain have become less willing to seek bipartisan compromise. Of the “Gang of 14” who sought a compromise on federal judicial nominations in 2005 and averted a filibuster showdown, “just seven will be in the Senate in 2013. And that number includes
Arizona Sen. John McCain (R) who moved heavily rightward to win his primary in the 2010 election cycle.\textsuperscript{107}

Before the 1990s in Congress, there was more room for bipartisan legislation to reverse the Supreme Court. The realignment in Congress and steep dip in the number of moderates in the late 1980s and early 1990s coincides with the steep decline in the number of Congressional overrides.\textsuperscript{108}

Consider the Civil Rights Act of 1991, which reversed a large number of conservative Supreme Court decisions interpreting Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. It is almost unthinkable today that such a measure could pass in the very conservative Republican House, or get past a Republican filibuster in a Democratic Senate. Even the Voting Rights Act renewal, which passed the Senate on a 98-0 vote in 2006, could well have been filibustered if it came up now given a sea change in Republican attitudes about the Act and the rise of mainstream Republicans ready to contend that a key part of the Act is unconstitutional.\textsuperscript{109} Indeed, renewal might not even get a vote in the Republican House today. The hardening of positions likely explains Congressional silence after the Supreme Court signaled that Congress needed to fix the Voting Rights Act or the Court would declare it unconstitutional.

Partisan overrides of Supreme Court statutory decisions remain possible, but only when the conditions are right. Republicans were able to overturn the \textit{Hamdan} decision granting certain habeas rights to enemy combatants by having a Republican President strongly pushing for the reversal and enough Senate Democrats conservative on national security issues to allow the vote to go through in the Senate. Democrats were able to overturn \textit{Ledbetter} and its tough statute of limitations for certain employment discrimination claims when the President made it a campaign issue and a priority as he entered office with high political capital, Democrats controlled the House and Senate (and at the time had nearly a filibuster-proof majority), and Senate Democrats gained the support of women Republican Senators who crossed party lines to vote in favor the bill.

Both of these overrides required an unusual set of events: a President, House, and Senate majority of the same party; a President with ample political capital; and enough cross-over votes to beat a filibuster (something which looks unlikely to occur frequently as the remaining Senate moderates retire or are beaten in elections). Consider again how President Obama got the health care through without a vote to spare in the Senate. Unless those conditions arise again, it is hard to see either side being able to do much on this issue even if Republicans capture the Senate and the Presidency in 2012.

\textsuperscript{108} See also Neal Devins, \textit{Party Polarization and Congressional Committee Consideration of Constitutional Questions}, 105 NW. U. L. REV. 737, 782 (2011) (finding that “party polarization has played a significant role in the decline in constitutional hearings in every congressional committee except the Judiciary Committee.”).

To test whether we are seeing a decline in the number of bipartisan overrides compared to partisan overrides I examined each of the laws which appeared on both Mayhew’s list of major legislation and on either Eskridge’s list of overrides (confined to overrides of Supreme Court, and not lower federal court cases) or my list of overrides from 1991-2010 contained in Appendix 1.110 By focusing on these major cases, I aim to eliminate most technical overrides and focus on those laws which were likely to be significant pieces of legislation likely to have been focused upon by Members of Congress.111

With one exception,112 I classified an override from the list as “bipartisan” if on the final roll call vote obtained yes votes from at least 20 Senators of each party and at least 40 House members of each party. If there were fewer than 20 Senators from a party or 40 House members from a party supporting it, I classified it as “partisan.”

There are 29 overlapping laws on Mayhew’s list of major legislation and on Eskridge’s or my list of overrides.113 Six of these overrides occurred in the 1967-74 period, and five of six were bipartisan overrides (83%). Seventeen of these overrides occurred in the 1975-1990 period, and fifteen of seventeen (88%) were bipartisan overrides. One of the two partisan overrides in this period missed being classified as bipartisan by a single Senate vote (19 Republican Senators voted for it).

Six overrides from this list occurred from 1991-2010. Half of the overrides were bipartisan; half were partisan: the Civil Rights Act of 1991 (overruling 9 Supreme Court civil rights cases) (bipartisan); the Financial Services Modernization Act of 1999 (bipartisan, although the override of Barnett Bank of Marion County., N.A. v. Nelson114 seems minor and, did not get mentioned at any point in the New York Times); the Detainee Treatment Act of 2005 (overruling Rasul) (partisan); the Military Commission Act of 2006 (overruling Hamdan) (partisan); the Family Smoking Prevention and Tobacco Control Act of 2009 (giving the FDA authority to regulate tobacco products) (bipartisan); and the Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act of 2009 (overruling Ledbetter) (partisan).

110 In the analysis which follows, I exclude 2011-12 because Mayhew has not yet listed his major legislation for this period.
111 Some of these overrides appear to be minor pieces of more significant legislation, however.
112 This exception is for the Detainee Transfer Act. See supra notes 82-84 and accompanying text.
113 Appendix 2 contains the list of overlapping overrides.
114 517 U.S. 25.
Figure 12 shows the percentage of partisan overrides in each of the three periods.

This rise in partisan overrides of major legislation is subject to a caveat. Mayhew’s list of major legislation does not count many significant amendments to existing law (which override Supreme Court caselaw). I identified eight significant amendments from Eskridge’s or my list not included on Mayhew’s list from 1972-2010. Each of these amendments, including two in the most recent 1991-2010 period, were bipartisan overrides of Supreme Court cases. Figure 13 shows that with these laws included, the extent of bipartisan overrides in the most recent period does not look quite as dramatic, but is still much higher compared to the earlier periods.

---

115 On the conditions when Congress is likely to amend significant legislation, see Forest Maltzman & Charles R. Shipan, Change, Continuity, and the Evolution of the Law, 52 AM. J. POL. SCI. 252 (2008).

116 The list of these amendments appear in Appendix 3.
Whether or not one considers the amendments in this assessment, the trend is clear: Congress is passing fewer bipartisan overrides of major legislation (both absolutely and as a percentage of all override legislation) and there is a potential for more partisan overrides in the future under the right conditions.

As moderates continue to leave Congress, and as members of both Houses become more polarized the chances of bipartisan overrides diminish. Polarized overrides will arise in periods of unified government. In addition, technical overrides should continue. There is enough legislation passed by even a polarized Congress of a more technical nature, and overrides of Supreme Court decisions will likely continue on issues of low salience or those pushed by lobbyists. But most important overrides of Supreme Court decisions are likely to remain fewer in number and supported by one party over the opposition of the other in conditions of unified government.
III. POLARIZATION AND THE SUPREME COURT NOMINATIONS PROCESS

 Overrides of Supreme Court statutory interpretation decisions are just one way in which Congress interacts with the Supreme Court. Another important interaction is the Senate’s role in confirming Supreme Court judicial nominees. Polarization in both the Senate and the Supreme Court could complicate the confirmation process going forward, potentially changing the nature of the Senate, the Supreme Court, or both.

A. Supreme Court Partisan Realignment

 Part II of this Article described the rise of polarization in the Senate and the loss of Senate moderates. Consider now polarization at the Supreme Court.

 Ideological polarization at the Supreme Court is nothing new. Each term, the Court issues a fair number of decisions on 5-4 votes, and many of those decisions are ideological, with liberals siding against conservatives. Among the issues on which the Court has divided 5-4 along ideological lines in the last few years are abortion, affirmative action, campaign finance, and the treatment of enemy combatants.

 Over the last 12 years, the Court has issued an average of 19 5-4 decisions each term, with 70% of those 5-4 divides representing an ideological split and 62% of those ideological splits resulting in a conservative victory. Justice Kennedy has been the most important swing voter, as a conservative Justice who sometimes sides with liberals: from the October 2006 to October 2010 term, Justice Kennedy has been in the majority in 5-4 decisions 80 percent of the time. The big surprise in the health care ruling was that it was Chief Justice

---

123 Id. at 15.
Roberts, and not Justice Kennedy, who cast the deciding votes with the liberal Justices in upholding the bulk of the health care law.

While ideological polarization at the Supreme Court is not new, what is new is that ideological polarization lines up with a partisan polarization: on the current Court, all the conservative Justices have been nominated by Republican presidents and all the liberal Justices have been nominated by Democratic presidents. President George W. Bush replaced conservative/moderate Justice Sandra Day O’Connor with strong conservative Justice Samuel Alito. Justices John Paul Stevens and David Souter were the last liberal-leaning Republican-appointed Justices to leave the Court, replaced by President Obama with Justices Sonia Sotomayor and Elena Kagan. Justice Byron White was the last conservative-leaning Democrat-appointed Justice to leave the Court replaced with strong liberal Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg by President Clinton.124

This new alignment of ideology and party poses dangers for the Court. Partisan divides may undermine the Court’s legitimacy, as the public may be more inclined to view the Court’s decisions—fairly or not—as partisan decisions made by partisan actors. Public approval of the Supreme Court has been declining recently,125 and it is possible (although by no means certain) that the decline will continue, undermining the Court’s legitimacy. Some observers have speculated that Chief Justice Roberts sided with the liberals in the health care case precisely to maintain the Court’s legitimacy among elites and the public.126

In addition to affecting public opinion, party realignment threatens the Supreme Court judicial confirmation process, the issue to which I now turn.

B. Senate Confirmations in the New Partisan Era

Recent attacks on the Supreme Court from the left have accused the five conservative/Republican-appointed Justices of deciding cases such as Citizens United, which opened up corporate spending in federal elections, to benefit

Republicans politically.127 The more people think of the Justices as dividing on partisan lines and deciding cases the same partisan way in which legislators decide on legislative actions (whether or not that is an accurate characterization), the easier it will be for Senators to oppose judicial nominations on ideological/partisan grounds.

Despite Chief Justice Roberts’ vote to uphold the health care law, his opinion on the scope of the Commerce Clause narrowed congressional power and was very similar to the position on the issue taken by the four health care dissenters and opposed by the four liberal/Democrat-appointed Justices on the Court. In coming terms we can expect similar ideological/partisan splits on the Court on issues such as affirmative action, voting rights, and abortion rights with the Chief Justice proving to be no liberal.129 The claim that “Republican Justices” decide controversial constitutional cases in line with Republican values and that “Democratic Justices” decide many such cases in line with Democratic values will have increasing resonance.

This partisan realignment comes as Senators have become more vocal and explicit in opposing Supreme Court nominees on ideological grounds. As Lee Epstein, Jeffrey A. Segal, and Chad Westerland found, “While it is true that ideology has always played some role in [Supreme Court] judicial appointments, its importance seems to be increasing with time. [T]he degree to which candidates share the political value of their nominating presidents is higher now that it was 127 Adam Liptak, In Supreme Court Term, Striking Unity on Major Cases, N.Y. TIMES, June 30, 2012, http://www.nytimes.com/2012/07/01/us/supreme-court’s-recent-term-a-new-phase.html (“In the wake of the blockbuster Citizens United decision, which by a 5-to-4 vote along ideological lines opened the door for corporations and unions to spend as much as they like to support or oppose political candidates, the court was accused of naked partisanship for seeming to favor Republican interests.”).

128 See id. (“But in the last term, the Roberts court proved itself resistant to caricature.”).

129 Ronald Dworkin, A Bigger Victory Than We Knew, N.Y. REV. BOOKS, Aug. 2012, http://www.nybooks.com/articles/archives/2012/aug/16/bigger-victory-we-knew/ (“The Court will have the opportunity to overrule its 2003 decision allowing state universities to take an admission candidate’s race into account, as one factor among others, in seeking a diverse student body. The conservative justices might wish to abolish affirmative action altogether, or to impose more stringent restrictions on it. They will also have the opportunity to reverse lower courts by upholding the Defense of Marriage Act, which forbids federal agencies to treat gay marriages as real, for example by allowing a gay couple to file a joint income tax return. [¶] The same justices will also be asked to strike down an important part of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, which requires states with particularly bad voting rights records to seek federal permission for new changes in their election laws. No doubt, moreover, they will soon find a chance further to constrict or even to abolish abortion rights. Roberts may want to blunt the anticipated accusations of political partisanship that any right-wing decisions in these cases will likely attract by supporting Obama’s health care program now. If so, he will have been immeasurably helped by his new enemies in the right-wing media who are painting him as a secret liberal, or as a turncoat villain with a deteriorating mind.”).
just three decades ago. And...although Senators of today no less than those of yesterday attend to the nominees’ qualifications, ideological compatibility now takes precedence.”

Consider the 2005 statement then-Senator Obama made against the nomination of John Roberts to be Chief Justice of the United States:

There is absolutely no doubt in my mind Judge Roberts is qualified to sit on the highest court in the land. Moreover, he seems to have the comportment and the temperament that makes for a good judge. He is humble, he is personally decent, and he appears to be respectful of different points of view. It is absolutely clear to me that Judge Roberts truly loves the law. He couldn't have achieved his excellent record as an advocate before the Supreme Court without that passion for the law, and it became apparent to me in our conversation that he does, in fact, deeply respect the basic precepts that go into deciding 95 percent of the cases that come before the Federal court -- adherence to precedence, a certain modesty in reading statutes and constitutional text, a respect for procedural regularity, and an impartiality in presiding over the adversarial system. All of these characteristics make me want to vote for Judge Roberts.

The problem I face — a problem that has been voiced by some of my other colleagues, both those who are voting for Mr. Roberts and those who are voting against Mr. Roberts — is that while adherence to legal precedent and rules of statutory or constitutional construction will dispose of 95 percent of the cases that come before a court, so that both a Scalia and a Ginsburg will arrive at the same place most of the time on those 95 percent of the cases — what matters on the Supreme Court is those 5 percent of cases that are truly difficult. In those cases, adherence to precedent and rules of construction and interpretation will only get you through the 25th mile of the marathon. That last mile can only be determined on the basis of one’s deepest values, one’s core concerns, one’s broader perspectives on how the world works, and the depth and breadth of one’s empathy.

The shift to explicit consideration of ideology and away from at least an ostensible focus on judicial competence has coincided with increasing partisan split on votes for Supreme Court judicial confirmations. Putting aside the contentious Bork hearings (to which I will return) and Justice Thomas’s confirmation vote, which occurred after a highly contentious hearing in which he was accused of sexual harassment.\textsuperscript{132} Supreme Court nominees until recently\textsuperscript{133} enjoyed bipartisan support in confirmation votes. Justices Scalia and Kennedy were approved on unanimous votes,\textsuperscript{134} and Justices Breyer and Ginsburg had few votes against them.\textsuperscript{135}

---

More recent votes have seen much more substantial opposition to nominees along party lines. Chief Justice Roberts had 22 votes cast against him, all by Democrats and without any objections raised to his qualifications.\textsuperscript{136} Justice Alito had 42 votes cast against him (two more than necessary for a filibuster, had Democrats decided to filibuster), gaining yes votes from only two Democrats.\textsuperscript{137} Justice Sotomayor had 31 votes cast against her, garnering the support of nine Republicans.\textsuperscript{138} The most recent nominee, Justice Kagan, had 37 votes cast against her, gaining only five Republican votes.\textsuperscript{139} Opposing Senators did not raise any serious questions about the qualifications of any of these nominees.

Notably, the two Democrats voting for Justice Alito (Conrad and Nelson) will have left the Senate by 2013, and three of the five Republicans voting for Justice Kagan (Gregg, Lugar, and Snowe) will have left the Senate by 2013. Each of these Senators was known as a moderate. Figure 14 shows the number of “No” \textsuperscript{133} Senate rejections of Supreme Court nominees have fluctuated over time. The Senate rejected three nominees besides Bork in the 20th Century, and Justice Fortas withdrew his nomination to be Chief Justice after a filibuster. http://www.senate.gov/pagelayout/reference/nominations/Nominations.htm. Nonetheless, the vast majority of Supreme Court nominees in the last century were confirmed. In the 21st century, so far only one nominee, Harriet Miers, withdrew her nomination. None have been filibustered. \textit{Id}.

\textsuperscript{134} Justice Scalia was approved on 98-0 vote and Kennedy on a 97-0 vote. Id. Justice Thomas’s vote was 52-48, but the nomination became embroiled in controversy over sexual harassment allegations. See Gibbs, \textit{supra} note 120.

\textsuperscript{136} The roll call vote is available at: http://www.senate.gov legislative/LIS/roll_call_lists/roll_call_votecfm.cfm?congress=109&session=1&vote=00245.

\textsuperscript{137} The roll call vote is available at: http://www.senate.gov legislative/LIS/roll_call_lists/roll_call_votecfm.cfm?congress=109&session=2&vote=00002.

\textsuperscript{138} The roll call vote is available at: http://www.senate.gov legislative/LIS/roll_call_lists/roll_call_votecfm.cfm?congress=111&session=1&vote=00262.

\textsuperscript{139} The roll call vote is available at: http://www.senate.gov legislative/LIS/roll_call_lists/roll_call_votecfm.cfm?congress=111&session=2&vote=00229.
votes received by each current member of the Supreme Court during the nomination process.

The big question is whether the increasing partisan opposition to Supreme Court nominees on ideological grounds will lead Senators to begin to consider filibustering Supreme Court nominees from the other party. The issue could come to a head when Justice Kennedy, the perennial “swing” Justice, leaves the Court.

In recent years, both Democratic Senators and Republican Senators have filibustered, stalled, or put holds on lower court nominees, especially nominees to the federal appellate courts. Senators are especially interested in filibustering young appellate court judges, such as Republican Miguel Estrada (filibustered by Democrats) or Democrat Goodwin Liu, who appear on track for a Supreme Court nomination and who would benefit from having judicial experience on the resume.

The trend to fight over lower court nominees has only accelerated during the Obama administration. Increasingly partisans on both sides (when their 140 The data source for Figure 14 is: http://www.senate.gov/pagelayout/reference/nominations/Nominations.htm.

---

143 For histories and analyses of this period, see Michael Gerhardt & Richard Painter, “Extraordinary Circumstances:” The Legacy of the Gang of 14 and Proposal for Judicial party was in the Senate majority) have called for the majority to use the so-called “nuclear option:” a parliamentary move in which a bare Senate majority would eliminate the filibuster for judicial nominees.

It is hard to know how the much the battle over lower court judicial nominations would be like a battle over a Kennedy replacement. Lower court nominations are of much lower salience than Supreme Court nominations, especially a nomination to replace a swing Justice on a sharply divided partisan court. When the moment comes for a new nomination, interest groups will mobilize, social media will buzz, and political partisans from all sides will put intense pressure on Senators from the opposition party to filibuster any nominee would be a strong conservative or liberal on the Court. Some will defend the filibuster as a means of insuring the placement of ideological moderates on the Court. But in the past, even when it came to controversial nominations such as Justice Thomas’s, where there were more than enough votes to filibuster, Senators have not been willing to pull the trigger.

The hardening of partisan positions in the Senate and the lack of Senate moderates increases the chances that a stalemate over a Supreme Court judicial nominee could lead to a standoff over the use of the filibuster. In this way, a coming dispute differs markedly from the fight over the Bork nomination. While some attribute the current tensions over judicial nominees to the Bork fight, the Senate in the years following the fight managed to overcome that division, easily confirming four of the next five Supreme Court nominees (two Democrats and two Republicans) unanimously or by lopsided majorities. But the four most recent nominees now sitting (in the years furthest from the Bork hearings)—all 144 For an explanation of how the “nuclear option” would work, see Gerhardt & Painter, supra note 143, at 974-76. On the modern filibuster as “one of the central features of American politics,” see McCarty, supra note 89, at 236.

---

145 See William A. Galston, Political Polarization and the U.S. Judiciary, 77 UMKC Law Review 307, 323 (2008) (“In the meantime…de facto governance by supermajorities in the Senate should continue. We simply see no other means of restraining the possibility that now, by the slimmest of margins, presidents may imbue fellow partisans on the Supreme Court for spans of a quarter-century or more.”); John O. McGinnis & Michael B. Rappaport, the Judicial Filibuster, The Median Senator, and the Counter-Majoritarian Difficulty, 2005 SUP. CT. REV. 257 (Senate filibuster “will tend to make justices more moderate, where moderate means having a jurisprudential view closer to the view held by the median Senator”).

146 See Lee Epstein, Rene Linstadt, Jeffrey A. Segal, & Chad Westerland, The Changing Dynamics of Senate Voting on Supreme Court Nominees, 68 J. POL. 296 (2006). For a skeptical view of the importance of the Bork controversy on more recent judicial nomination battles, see SARAH A. BINDER & FORREST MALTZMAN, ADVICE & DISSENT: THE STRUGGLE TO SHAPE THE FEDERAL JUDICIARY 7-9 (2009).
eminently well qualified jurists—have been confirmed on sharply divided votes, with substantial numbers of Senators from the opposing party voting against the nominee. Something seems to have changed fundamentally in the Senate.

C. Possible Ramifications of a Senate Showdown

If the partisan Senate has an extended confrontation over a Supreme Court judicial nominee, the confrontation might end in a number of ways. The nominating president might withdraw a nomination, and nominate a replacement candidate seen as more moderate by the minority threatening a filibuster. Alternatively, the President and Senate majority might hold firm on the original nominee, and trigger the “nuclear option,” removing the possibility of filibustering Supreme Court (or all federal) judicial nominees. Senators alternatively might conclude that triggering the nuclear option could have potentially negative consequences for the Senate’s conduct of business. They could strike a more radical compromise on Supreme Court judicial nominations. For example, Senators might limit judicial terms to 18 years, which would lower the costs of confirming an ideological Justice to the Court and insure more turnover on the Court.

The second of these options could change the nature of the Senate greatly. A move away from the filibuster would turn the Senate into a more majoritarian institution, and making the Senate more like the House, it could further exacerbate partisan tensions. Ending the filibuster only as to judicial nominees would strengthen the Senate compared to the Court, by allowing greater control of the Court’s composition. Ending the filibuster more broadly could give political parties in times of united government (where a single party controls House, Senate and Presidency) an unprecedented opportunity to enact and change major public policies, subject only to control by an ideologically divided Supreme Court.

Alternatively, Supreme Court term limits could change the nature of the Court. Lowering the stakes, term limits should make ideological judges easier to confirm. However, term limits might further solidify the ideological nature of Supreme Court judging by providing a path for presidents to nominate more ideological Justices. More speculatively, term limits create a risk that Justices will 147 I assume that if the President and Senate majority are of opposite parties, the President will be more likely to nominate a moderate nominee marginally acceptable to the Senate majority.

---

148 For a review and critique of the various term limits proposals, see Mary L. Clark, Judicial Retirement and Return to Practice, 60 CATH. U. L. REV. 841 (2011).

149 It would only be internally majoritarian. Because each state gets two Senators regardless of population, and some states have vastly larger populations than others, some filibusters actually could promote (voter) majority rule. FRANCES E. LEE & BRUCE I. OPPENHEIMER, SIZING UP THE SENATE: THE UNEQUAL CONSEQUENCES OF EQUAL REPRESENTATION (1999).
judge keeping their future career prospects in mind, especially as a judicial term comes to an end.\textsuperscript{150} Both of these paths suggest dangers to the long term legitimacy of the Court, as the public and elites may tend to see Justices as both ideological and self interested.

All of this of course is speculation. Perhaps the correlation of ideology and party in the Supreme Court will not matter to the increasingly partisan Senate, and the Court’s legitimacy will remain stable. The Senate confirmation process may chug along as always. But the loss of Senate moderates makes it more likely than in the past that a Supreme Court nomination could explode into a major political crisis.

IV. CONCLUSION

Political polarization is changing power relationships between Congress and the Supreme Court, in some ways which are evident, such as through a more ideological Supreme Court confirmation process, and in some ways which have been mostly hidden, such as through the dramatic decline in Congressional overrides of Supreme Court statutory interpretation caselaw.

As Congress becomes ever more partisan and its moderates are forced out or retire, and as Supreme Court Justices become associated increasingly with the views of the President and party who appointed them, the Congress-Supreme Court relationship is likely to change further. Congressional overrides likely will occur infrequently, but more often on a partisan basis in periods of unified government. Otherwise, the Court is more likely to have the last word on federal statutory meaning.

In the longer term, the task of replacing a swing Supreme Court Justice could lead to an unprecedented confrontation in the Senate, with the potential to change the nature of the Senate, the Supreme Court, or both bodies. As the institutions respond to the pressures of polarization, power relationships will continue to shift.

\textsuperscript{150} See \textit{id.} at 904 (arguing against the ability of retiring Article III judges to return to practice following a term as a judge because of “the real and apparent threats to judicial independence, impartiality, and integrity presented” by return).
APPENDIX 1
CONGRESSIONAL OVERRIDES OF SUPREME COURT STATUTORY INTERPRETATION CASES, 1991-2012

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>YEAR</th>
<th>CONGRESSIONAL ACT</th>
<th>SUPREME COURT CASE OVERRULED</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1995</td>
<td>Paperwork Reduction Act of 1995</td>
<td>Dole v. United Steelworkers of</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Year</td>
<td>Act/Case Description</td>
<td>Relevant Cases/Acts</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------</td>
<td>----------------------</td>
<td>---------------------</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
APPENDIX 2
CONGRESSIONAL OVERRIDES OF SUPREME COURT STATUTORY
INTERPRETATION CASES, 1967-2010, ALSO APPEARING ON MAYHEW’S
LIST OF “MAJOR LEGISLATION”

Family Smoking Prevention and Tobacco Control Act of 2009
Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act of 2009
Military Commission Act of 2006
Detainee Treatment Act of 2005
Financial Services Modernization Act of 1999
Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996
Civil Rights Act of 1991
Immigration Act of 1990
Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1990
Financial Institutions Reform, Recovery and Enforcement Act of 1989
Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988
Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1987
Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986
Tax Reform Act of 1986
Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984
Deficit Reduction Act of 1984
Voting Rights Act Amendments of 1982
Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1981
Airline Deregulation Act of 1978
Clean Air Act Amendments of 1977
Federal Land Policy and Management Act of 1976
Copyrights Act (1976)
Tax Reform Act of 1976
Voting Rights Act Extension (1975)
Magnuson-Moss Warranty FTC Improvements Act (1974)
Freedom of Information Act (1974)
Fair Labor Standards Amendment of 1974
Trans-Alaska Pipeline Authorization Act (1973)
Equal Employment Opportunity Amendment of 1972
Organized Crime Control Act of 1970
APPENDIX 3

SIGNIFICANT CONGRESSIONAL OVERRIDES OF SUPREME COURT
STATUTORY INTERPRETATION CASES THROUGH AMENDMENTS, 1967-2010, NOT APPEARING ON MAYHEW’S LIST OF “MAJOR LEGISLATION”

- Americans with Disabilities Act Amendments of 2008
- Voting Rights Act Amendments of 2006
- Clean Air Act Amendments of 1990
- Bankruptcy Reform Act of 1978
- Endangered Species Act Amendments of 1978
- Pregnancy Discrimination Act of 1978
- Age Discrimination in Employment Act Amendments of 1978
- Longshoreman's & Harbor Workers Compensation Act Amendments of 1972
Identifying congressional overrides is a challenge, as there is no single repository of such information. It turns out to be an increasingly difficult challenge, as committee reports appear less likely than twenty years ago (the end of Eskridge’ study) to explicitly note a congressional override. Thus, while Eskridge wrote that he did not count as overrides “statutes for which the legislative history—mainly committee reports and hearings—[do] not indicate a legislative focus on judicial decisions,” it appears necessary to count some overrides of statutes where there is no committee report showing a legislative focus on Supreme Court decisions. On the other hand, if thanks to new technology I am able to delve more deeply into the legislative weeds than Eskridge was able to do in 1990, then I may lose the apples-to-apples comparison with his data that I am hoping for.

I began my search using Westlaw, searching House and Senate committee reports from 1991 to the present for indications that a successful piece of federal legislation overturned, reversed, or modified a Supreme Court statutory interpretation holding. Like Eskridge, I did not count congressional bills which simply “codified” or “clarified” Supreme Court cases, and I did not count bills which implicitly overruled a Supreme Court statutory interpretation decision.152 When I shared an earlier draft of this Article with other scholars, some scholars suggested additional possible overrides to me which did not come up on my initial searches. I then refined my Westlaw search to capture these additional overrides. I used the following search in the USCCAN-REP Westlaw database: (OVERRUL! MODIF! CORRECT! CLARIF! REVERS! REJECT! DISAGREE! ERRONEOUS! MISINTERPRET! OVERTURN! RESTOR!) /10 "SUPREME COURT" & date(aft 1990). It captured almost all of the cases I and others had identified.153 I also examined every mention of “Supreme Court” in this database from January 1, 2009 through August 1 2012, and it did not yield any additional cases beyond my more restrictive search. My research assistant replicated these searches.

I then searched the Westlaw “JLR” (Journals and Law Review) database for law review articles from 1990 forward mentioning potential congressional overrides of federal statutes. This JLR yielded a handful of additional cases.

151 Eskridge, supra note 28, at 332 n.1.
152 Like Eskridge, Barnes excluded implicit overrides “on practical grounds; such overrides are extremely difficult—if not impossible—to identify.” BARNES, supra note 43, at 23.
153 Ironically, this search did not find a 1995 law entitled “Reversal of Adams Fruit Co. v. Barrett.”
I believe that these research methods have revealed most major overrides of Supreme Court statutory interpretation cases since 1991. However, despite these efforts, there is no doubt that I have missed some, probably minor, overrides. For example, none of the legislative materials on Westlaw indicate that the Anti-Terrorism and Effect Death Penalty Act of 2006 overruled any Supreme Court cases. But upon hearing that Congress passed the law with that intent, I asked UCI librarians to search additional sources for express evidence of a Congressional intent to override. The librarians located a report, not available on Westlaw, which confirms the intent to override.154 There may be other isolated overrides neither mentioned in committee reports available on Westlaw nor noted in journals or law reviews.

I have also erred on the side of including, rather than excluding, questionable claws as overrides. For example, a House report on the 2009 law giving the FDA authority to regulate tobacco as a drug describes the Supreme Court as having concluded in a 2000 case that Congress did not intend to give the FDA such authority. The report describes Congress in the 2009 as giving the FDA such authority at this point going forward—thereby modifying the law going forward, as opposed to reversing the Court’s prior interpretation.155 I nonetheless coded this law as an override.

155 H.R. REP. 111-706, H.R. Rep. No. 706, 111TH Cong., 2ND Sess. 2011, 2011 WL 71436 (“A resulting Supreme Court decision in 2000, while acknowledging that tobacco use posed ‘perhaps the single most significant threat to public health in the United States,’ found that Congress had not given FDA authority over tobacco products as part of the FFDCA. [¶] The Family Smoking Prevention and Tobacco Control Act amends the FFDCA to grant FDA the authority to regulate tobacco products”).